Europeanization of Environmental Policy in the New Europe

Beyond Conditionality

Mats Braun, Institute of International Relations, Czech Republic

'A major contribution to the literature on the limits of Europeanization and state socialization after the Eastern enlargement of the European Union. In mastering the various facets of environmental policy in Central Europe, Braun shows us how relevant this policy field is for the study of the differentiated understanding of EU norms and values by the EU member states.'

Elsa Tulmets, CERI / Sciences Po, Paris, France

'The European Union has often been considered to be a global environmental champion promoting the diffusion of norms such as ecological modernization, sustainable development or the precautionary principle. But the accession of the ten Eastern European states has increased heterogeneity within the EU, making common agreements on shared norms ever more difficult. Based on impeccable methodological underpinnings that connect the EU's ability to norm diffusion and domestic contexts, Mats Braun's book is the first one to show how the new member states are successfully socialized into EU decision-making – and the problems that remain. This will be a crucial reading both for scholars and practitioners interested in the transformative power of Europe, its impact on Central and European Member states, and the future of the EU's green agenda.'

Aron Buzogány, University of Munich, Germany

In this book, Mats Braun offers an up-to-date account of how post-communist member states have handled policy initiatives in the field of environmental policy after accession. Using detailed case studies of how Bulgaria, Czech Republic, Poland and Romania dealt with two different EU policy initiatives – REACH and the Climate-Energy Package – he explores whether social norms and the process of socialization can help us understand why the track record of new member states in the area of environmental policy is more varied than was originally envisaged prior to enlargement.

Contents: Preface; Introduction; The role of norms and social learning; The Green norms the EU promotes; Comparing 'new' and 'old' member states – transposition, implementation and coordination; The new member states and EU chemical policy; The new member states and EU climate policy; Concluding discussion; References; Index.
